Accordingly we find in the writings of dispocrates, and the chain of medical writers from his time down to the present, traces of efforts to apply this method to the discases of the lungs, but all of the crudest kind, resolving themselves in to inhaling fumigations arising from burning gums, resins, and herbs, the fome of heated cinnabar realgar, and other substances volatilizable by heat. These were received into the throat by holding the nose and mouth over the ascending vapors, and and mouth over the ascending vapors, and drawing them into the lungs in inspiration.

Any one curious in such matters will find a description of this method in Buchas's Commentaries, article "Consumption." This
